KAJVYANCHA GAON is one of the city's most powerful contemporary plays, with 117 shows till now delving into the politics of the Dixit family that has gathered for the matriarch Kalindi's 80th birthday. Behind the family drama is a web of social frictions of values. On April 24 and 25, the prequel to the play set 50 years before in newly Independent India, will be held at The Box in Erandwane.

Titled Hutashani, after the night of Holi when evil is burnt to make way for the new, the play is the backstory of Kalindi. "She went through great suffering and built this particular family, and now the next generations do not value what happened before," says Pradeep Vaiddya, an awardwinning theatre artist who has written and directed the plays and is waging his own battles to perform them according to old values of the stage

Theatre has been becoming smaller over the last decade, with financial constraints prompting directors to have smaller casts and simpler sets that can travel easily. Vaiddva, instead, opted to have 42 actors playing the different characters in different shows in Kajvyancha Gaon and a cast of 11

With Hutashani, the director stopped after a dozen shows and is now bringing it back as an intimate expierience rather than a proscenium production. While the costumes are realistically of the 1950s, the set design has several stark elements that transport the audience in time, such as brass utensils and sliding windows that can still be seen in old Konkan houses. It is a fitting--though a coincidence--that Hutashani reopens during the general elections when the country's own values are under the spotlight.

"The plot revolves around a family but, at a deeper level, it is about taking sides in order to stand by your own values. It is about tolerance, an understanding among people, and the bonds that keep a community together,' says Vaiddya.
